protest in contrast to the ever-tolling Chinese, whose holidays are almost entirely confined to their annual New Year's merry-making. By the substitution of the Christian Sabbath for the former days the Japanese Government have diminished the number of holidays, and it is probable that in making the change they had this object in view. But it may well be hoped that they were actuated partly by a desire to pave the way for the ultimate adoption of Christianity by the whole nation. The Japanese mind evidently believes that a great revolution in opinion on this question has recently taken place in Japan. It expresses itself quite certainly in the attitude of the Government and of a very large number of the people of this country towards Christianity. It has undergone a remarkable change during the past year or two. Formerly they stand in no fear of it, and many think that in its adoption lies the only true hope for the future of the country. The Government which had long and not unnaturally held it in such mortal terror, now pays little attention to the proceedings of those whose avocation it is to persecute its doctrines and principles; and very sensibly places no bar to the diffusion of translations of the Scriptures. It is a great thing to find the Government of a heathen country willing to allow full religious liberty throughout their dominions, and there is good hope of its raising ground under such conditions. When, however, a Government looks favourably upon and embraces Christianity, its spread is exceedingly rapid. The Roman Emperor CONSTANTINE, by recognizing Paganism for it, practically changed the faith of the Empire at one stroke. In modern times some of the chiefs in the islands of the Pacific have, by setting the example, brought about the speedy conversion of a whole group of islands to Christianity. It is true that such sudden and sweeping changes are sometimes followed by a partial reaction in favour of the old idolatry, or are attended by a blending of the two together which tends to corrupt and obscure the true religion, but the result, in the long run, is undoubtedly beneficial, for Christianity in any form is preferable to the cruel and senseless superstitions of a gloomy and hopeless Paganism. The Japanese Government have not yet avowed adhesion to any Western belief, but it is not impossible that they may some time see fit to do so, on political grounds. In the meantime it is making its way among the people. A native paper states, as an item of news, that, owing to the daily increase in the number of professors of the Christian faith in Shikoku, Tokyo, many old Christians have been used for the reception of the family idol are now seen for sale in every town and village. Some people throw down and trample on their idols, and others that they have ever worshipped them. The Buddhists are, however, still powerful in the Empire, and their priesthood are making strenuous efforts to recover their former ascendancy. They are, of course, advocates of retrogression in other respects also, and it is therefore not probable that they will prove successful to any extent. They may indeed act as a drag on the wheels of the car of Progress, but they are powerless to turn its course. The old order of things in Japan is rapidly passing away, never, we confidently believe, to return. It is sincerely to be hoped that with ancient customs and manners the ancient faith will also disappear, and that the pure truths of Christianity will take the place of its dark and dreary dogmas.
